Is XP the fastest version of Windows ever? That's debatable, but this is not: like every operating system that came before it, it's not as fast as it could be without a whole bunch of fine-tuning. Windows operating systems are never streamlined by default. Part of the reason is that their install base is huge–many times that of any other operating system (in fact, probably every other operating system combined). No matter how well polished and optimized any Windows OS may be, Microsoft must balance performance with ease of use and across-the-board compatibility. Therefore, Windows XP makes quite a few assumptions about how it's going to be used. Its aesthetics are designed to give the GUI a warm, friendly appearance, but effects like drop shadows and fading menus slow the OS down ever so slightly. Failsafe tools like System Restore can make recovering from crashes and incompatibilities easier, but they eat up disk space and their quiet work in the background requires processor clock cycles.Windows XP also activates a whole batch of services that you may or may not need, depending on how you use your computer. Streamlining your system's pool of processes can expedite the OS's startup and save some clock cycles for foreground applications. Likewise, common commercial software like Quicken, Microsoft Office, and others load their own background applications that eat up system memory and monopolize the processor. If you spend a few minutes eliminating applets and services you don't need, and are willing to sacrifice some of XP's visual goodies, you can noticeably improve game and application performance on an XP box. XP itself even helps by optimizing its file system based on your computing habits, and Microsoft provides a few hands-on applets to speed up the optimization process. Many of the optimizations we present here will require registry editing or employing other system-altering modifications. You'll need administrative privileges on the machine in question. Before proceeding, you should disable any antivirus and security programs you may be using and make backups of critical data onto removable media.Windows XP is highly customizable. Microsoft took care to make a great deal of its tweaks easily accessible to users of any experience level. Experimenting with them and getting your hands dirty is the best way to find your personal sweet spot in the mix of eye candy and system performance. End approaches for Microsoft program that let companies block automatic update of Service Pack 2 to their Windows machines. Microsoft is alerting customers that it will soon start delivering Windows XP Service Pack 2 to all customers using Automatic Update, whether they want it or not. In response to requests from businesses, Microsoft last year released a tool that allowed companies to continue using the automatic update feature but temporarily block the security-oriented update from downloading. However, the grace period comes to an end on April 12. Microsoft has posted a warning on its Web site, alerting people about the impending deadline. "Time is running out!" Microsoft said. "Please note that the mechanism to temporarily disable delivery of Windows XP SP2 is only available for a period of 240 days (eight months) from Aug. 16, 2004. At the end of this period (after April 12, 2005), Windows XP SP2 will be delivered to all Windows and Windows XP Service Pack 1 systems." Microsoft first released the SP2-blocking tool in August, saying it would allow customers to put off the upgrade for 120 days. In September, Microsoft said it would double the length of time, to 240 days, to give businesses more time to test the software. In a statement, Microsoft said it is sticking to that schedule. "SP2 is an important, free security update for Windows XP customers that is already delivering value to over 180 million customers worldwide," said Jon Murchinson, a Microsoft product manager. The move affects only those who use Windows' automatic update to connect directly to Microsoft servers. Some businesses have reconfigured the automatic update feature to connect to their own corporate update servers. Those companies can continue to push out updates to their own schedule. While recognizing the need for customers to test software, Microsoft has been urging businesses to move to SP2 for its enhanced security benefits, particularly for portable machines that frequently travel in and out of a corporate firewall. now after entering the script you have to save it in the form of vbs file click save and write in the place were you name you file: the name that you want.vbs *remark: i mean by "the name that you want" the naming that you are free to put for your file after you save, just double click on the script file and the program will run were you will enter yousentence and the pc will read it! good luck hope you like this instructable please do make a comment, thanks ;) If you've considered dual booting Windows 7 with XP or Vista but all you really want is some Windows 7 eye candy, reader Dato' Fazly's Windows 7-like XP desktop might be right up your alley.If you're dying to try out Windows 7 but aren't ready to give up your installation of XP or Vista,...Read moreThe desktop consists of the Vistart skin (from deviantART), then employs a tutorial from AskVG for installing a custom SevenVG Refresh Theme. It's stable, has a Start button and gets the job done. That's why there are literally hundreds of millions of computers that still have it installed. It's so popular, in fact, that it's the second most installed operating system in the world, only a little bit behind Windows 7. Unfortunately, this isn't really a good thing. The reason being Microsoft. Up till now, Microsoft has been extending the deadline for when it would drop support for Windows XP, but now it seems they are really going to kill it off. On April 8th, 2014, Microsoft will stop supporting Windows XP completely. This is big news because it means in about 4 months, there will be millions of computers that are going to be vulnerable to hackers. Source: The Next Web End of support means Microsoft will no longer provide any technical assistance to businesses or consumers for Windows XP troubleshooting. In addition and more importantly, Microsoft will no longer provide any security patches or updates for the operating system. On top of that, you won't even be able to download Microsoft Security Essentials for Windows XP, the free antivirus software, after this date. This is really bad news for anyone who has Windows XP installed after this date because there are literally hundreds of security vulnerabilities detected in Windows XP every year and once support ends, all of those security holes will be exploited by hackers and there literally won't be anything to stop them. Several Microsoft executives have also stated openly that businesses and users who do not update the operating system or buy a new PC will be open to many new attacks. One possible solution if you still have to use XP for whatever reason is to disconnect the computer from the Internet. Obviously, the PC can still be infected over the LAN network, but you'll have a better chance than if it's connected directly to the Internet. For any business that needs support for Windows XP past the April 2014 deadline, another option is to install Windows Server 2003. Windows Server 2003 uses the same kernel as Windows XP and therefore can run all the same apps without any compatibility issues. Support for Windows Server 2003 does not end until July 15th 2015, so you can get an extra year to upgrade your apps to a newer operating system. As for consumers, according to Microsoft's official statement, they would love for you to upgrade to Windows 8.1. The other reason to upgrade from Windows XP to Windows 7 or Windows 8 is so that you can use the latest software and devices with your computer. XP is so old that a lot of new software simply will not run on it. In addition, some newer devices and gadgets may not be recognized by the system properly. Upgrading an old PC to Windows 8 is actually not a bad idea. I wrote a post a while back on revitalizing an old PC by installing Windows 8 on it. The system requirements are pretty low, meaning you can install it on some fairly old hardware. Of course, you'll have to buy Windows 8 Upgrade, which currently costs around $119, but that might be a better option than buying a new computer altogether. If you do install Windows 8 and you get any kind of error about the CPU not being compatible, check out the link. I've personally installed Windows 8.1 on a couple of old desktops at home and they work great for browsing, email, watching videos, reading news, etc. With Windows 8.1, you also kind of get the Start button back, so if you have been holding back because of the lack of a Start button, it's not that bad anymore in 8.1. Whatever you end up doing, if you don't upgrade a Windows XP computer, make sure you don't have any important data on it because everything will be at risk. However, if it's connected to your local network, a hacker could still take control of the XP machine and then wreak havoc on other computers on the network, so really the best thing is to get rid of Windows XP altogether. If you can't, tell us why in the comments!
